Swearing in the Bailiff

Thinking he wanted to study architecture in college, Bryan Chambers took three years of high school art classes before he decided to attend a university that does not have an architecture program instead. He received both his bachelor's (economics) and law degrees from Brigham Young University in Provo, Utah. Since graduation in 1992, he has been employed at the Gila County Attorney's Office, where he has been a chief deputy since 2002. He does not regret either his career or university choices, but enjoys making time to use the skills he developed in high school to paint one to two paintings per year.
