Experts That Excel

One challenging area of law practice is the lawyer–expert relationship. The need for experts spans all practice areas, and they can be invaluable for case assessment and courtroom testimony. But their necessity only makes more crucial the need for lawyers to select experts well and to foster associations with them.

- Do you always know when you need an expert?
- How do you find one?
- When you consult with experts, do you even ask the right questions?

In the following pages, we point to a few ways to get the best on your case. One author suggests how to negotiate conflicts of interest that may be obstacles to consultation. And we have asked experts themselves to speak on lawyers’ strengths and weaknesses in the selection process.

28 Expert Witnesses and Conflicts of Interest by Jeffrey Messing

31 The Practitioner’s Toolbox Finding and Keeping Experts

32 Counselors’ Counsel: Experts Speak Their Minds by Tim Eigo

34 Experts Are More Than Witnesses Trial Team Partners by Tim Eigo

Expert witness testimony is often a critical part of modern litigation. It is virtually impossible to bring a professional malpractice case to trial without expert witnesses on both sides.1 In addition, expert witnesses testify routinely on a variety of subjects in all kinds of civil litigation.2

It is not uncommon for a litigant to interview and even consult with several experts before choosing one to testify at trial. Given the number of cases and the sometimes limited pool of potential experts, it is inevitable that both sides will contact the same expert, or at least the same firm, occasionally. Questions then arise as to the circumstances, if any, in which an expert and/or a firm of experts can represent both sides to a litigation.

If one side contacts but chooses not to use an expert, is that expert free to work for the other side?

If one side has retained an expert or a member of the expert’s firm in the past or even currently in matters unrelated to the current litigation, can the expert testify for the other side?

Rules and Rulings Largely Silent

It is tempting to assume that the answers to these questions are provided by the Rules of Professional Conduct, which provide fairly specific guidance.3 The problem is that those Rules apply only to lawyers who are members of the Arizona State Bar.4 The Arizona Supreme Court has the power and jurisdiction to license and regulate attorneys practicing in Arizona.5 It is not at all clear that the Court has that ability to regulate the conduct of nonattorneys. Equally important, attorneys and experts perform different functions at trial. Attorneys are advocates. An expert may promote a party’s case, but the expert’s primary role is as a source of information.6 An expert is expected to use “scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge [to] assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue.”7

Federal Courts Speak

Although there is very little Arizona law on these issues, there is a growing body of federal law on the subject. The federal courts uniformly take the position that, given the proper facts, they have the power to disqualify an expert.8 The issue usually comes up in a situation in which one party discloses a trial expert with whom the opposing party had a previous relationship. The opposing party then moves to disqualify the expert. Most of the courts that have addressed this issue have applied a two-part test:

“First, was it objectively reasonable for the first party who claims to have retained the consultant . . . to conclude that a confidential relationship existed? Second, was any confidential or privileged information disclosed by the first party to the consultant?”9

Only if both questions are answered in the affirmative should the expert be disqualified.10 Some cases also consider a third factor: the public interest in allowing or not allowing an expert to testify:

“The policy objectives favoring disqualification include preventing conflicts of interest and maintaining the integrity of the judicial process. The main policy objectives militating against disqualification are ensuring that parties have access to expert witnesses who possess specialized knowledge and allowing experts to pursue their professional calling. Courts have also expressed concern that if experts are too easily subjected to disqualification, unscrupulous attorneys and clients may attempt to create an inexpensive relationship with potentially harmful experts solely to keep them from the opposing party.”11

These questions are, of course, factual in nature and will require the parties to submit affidavits and in some cases conduct an evidentiary hearing. The party seeking disqualification has the burden of proving both the grounds for disqualification and the nonwaiver of any confidentiality being asserted.12 On appeal, the trial court’s ruling is reviewed for an abuse of discretion.13
Expert Confidential Information

Much, if not all, of the information given to a testifying expert to prepare for trial will be subject to discovery and disclosure. Thus, an exchange of factual or technical information about a case will not meet a party’s burden of showing that the expert received or gave confidential information. In the context of expert disqualification, “confidential information” is defined as information that relates specifically to the litigation and includes such things as a party’s litigation strategy, assessment of the case or plans for additional experts that would not ordinarily be subject to discovery.

Some examples illustrate the application of these rules. United States ex rel. Cherry Hill Convalescent Center, Inc. v. Healthcare Rehab Systems, Inc. was a qui tam action filed by a nursing home charging a rehabilitation service provider with Medicare fraud. The defendant moved to disqualify the plaintiff’s accounting expert and his firm, arguing that the firm had access to confidential information relevant to the litigation based on its prior relationship as defendant’s auditor. The trial court held an evidentiary hearing, entered detailed findings and denied the disqualification motion. The court found that plaintiff’s expert had, in fact, rendered a variety of accounting services to defendant, including five independent annual audits of defendant’s financial condition. Defendant had terminated its relationship with the accounting firm prior to the suit, but the firm retained documents relating to defendant in its possession.

The Cherry Hill court concluded that defendant had established the existence of a confidential relationship; however, it denied the disqualification motion because defendant had not disclosed to the accounting firm any confidential information relating to the litigation.

The court recognized that the accounting firm was privy to confidential business and financial records relevant to the litigation, but it reasoned that the firm’s possession of that knowledge was not sufficient to warrant the expert’s disqualification, because there was no showing that any information had been shared with the individual who would testify and, in any event, such information would be discoverable in the litigation.

“Confidential business information, however, may be distinguished from communications or documents pertaining to litigation. The defendants have not submitted any evidence to the court to suggest that such confidences were ever exchanged between [defendant and the accounting firm].”

In contrast, in Mitchell v. Wilmore, a personal injury case, the court granted defendant’s motion to disqualify an expert he had previously retained and used as a pretrial consultant. The defendant in Mitchell submitted both a general affidavit intended for open court and a second affidavit for in camera review. The first affidavit provided a generic description of defense counsel’s discussions with the expert and stated that they had discussed counsel’s mental impressions of the case and litigation strategies. The in camera affidavit went into detail as to the confidential mental impressions and gave examples of several topics counsel recalled discussing with the experts. The Mitchell court concluded that the in camera affidavit established that defendant’s counsel had, in fact, shared their mental impressions of the case and litigation strategies. The in camera affidavit went into detail as to the confidential mental impressions and gave examples of several topics counsel recalled discussing with the experts.

Arizona Case on Point

Although there are no Arizona cases directly on point, what little authority there is seems consistent with these general rules. In Granger v. Wismer, the Arizona Supreme Court affirmed a trial court’s refusal to disqualify a defense expert who had previously reviewed the medical malpractice case as plaintiff’s pretrial consultant. The Court’s opinion assumed that upon a proper showing of discovery misconduct, the trial court could have excluded the expert’s testimony “even though no rule expressly provides for such a sanction.”28

In Granger, the parties framed the issue as whether the expert’s testimony was barred by either the attorney–client privilege or ARIZ.R.CIV.P. 26(b)(4)(B). The Granger Court rejected both bases for exclusion. The Court rejected the attorney–client privilege argument because the expert “was not questioned about and did not testify to any confidential communication he may have received from or given to the plaintiff or her previous counsel.”29 With respect to the Rule, the Court held that although the rule limits discovery of nonattesting consultants, it does not deal with the admissibility at trial of such an expert’s testimony that is elicited by the opponent.

Granger’s precedential value is weakened by its procedural history. The defendant in Granger listed the expert without objection in the joint pretrial statement and mentioned him during his opening statement. Plaintiff raised no objection until the third day of trial, when the expert was scheduled to testify. As the Supreme Court recognized, at that point, it would have been impossible for defendant to hire a new expert. The trial court allowed the expert to testify, and the Supreme Court affirmed.30 Therefore, Granger can be viewed as a waiver case, although the Court did conduct an extended analysis of the disqualification issue.

Granger predates virtually all of the expert disqualification cases discussed in this article. The parties and the Court framed the issues in terms of attorney–client privilege and the discovery of pretrial consultants under Rule 26(b)(4)(B) rather than in terms of the existence of a confidential relationship and the exchange of confidential, nondisclosable information. Nonetheless, much of Granger’s analysis is consistent with the general rules set out here. The Court rejected the per se disqualification rule that would have resulted from application of the Rules of Professional Conduct.31 At the same time, however, it implicitly recognized that a trial court does have discretion to disqualify an expert if there is a disclosure of privileged, confidential information relevant to the litigation. The Court also questioned the extent to which information disclosed to an expert can remain confidential.32 In short, the Granger Court seems to have anticipated the general thrust of subsequent case law, which should provide guidance to Arizona litigators in the absence of any direct authority from the Arizona courts.

Jeffrey Messing is a member of the Phoenix law firm Santin, Poli & Ball, P.L.C.

endnotes

1. E.g., Rudy v. Mohover, 706 P.2d 1254 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1985) (affirming grant of summary judgment in malpractice case brought against psychiatrist based on plaintiff’s failure to present testimony from a competent expert that defendant’s conduct fell below the applicable standard of care).
4. See Ariz.R.S.Ct. 41 and 42 (Preamble and Scope).
5. See Hunt v. Maricopa County Employees’ Merit System Commission, 619 P.2d 1036 (Ariz. 1980) (practice of law is a matter exclusively within authority of the judiciary); Ariz.R.S.Ct. 31 (establishing State Bar and limiting practice of law to active members).
8. E.g., Cordy v. Sherwin-Williams Co., 156 F.R.D. 575, 579 (D.N.J. 1994) (“any analysis properly begins with a recognition of the Court’s inherent power to disqualify experts”); Wang Lab., Inc. v. Toshiba Corp., 762 F. Supp. 1246, 1248 (E.D. Va. 1991) (power to disqualify “exists in furtherance of the judicial duty to protect the integrity of the adversary process and to promote public confidence in the fairness and integrity of the legal process”); Paul v. Rawlings Sporting Goods Co., 123 F.R.D. at 277-278 (court has power to disqualify expert to protect privileges that may be breached if expert changes sides during litigation or as part of the court’s inherent power to preserve public confidence in the fairness and integrity of the judicial process). See Granger v. Wimer, 656 P.2d 1238 (Ariz. 1982) (assuming trial court would have power to disqualify expert based on a proper showing of discovery misconduct).

14. See Ariz.R.Civ.P. 26.1(a)(6) (requiring disclosure of “the substance of the facts and opinions to which the expert is expected to testify [and] a summary of the grounds for each opinion”).

16. E.g., Koch Refining Co., 85 F.3d at 1182; United States ex rel. Cherry Hill Convalescent Center, 994 F. Supp. at 246.

18. A qui tam action “is one brought by an informer under a statute which establishes a penalty or forfeiture for the commission or omission of some act, and which additionally provides for the recovery of the same in a civil action with part of the recovery to go to the person bringing the action.” United States ex rel. Burnette v. Driving Hawk, 587 F.2d 23, 24 n. 4 (8th Cir. 1978); see generally 70 C.J.S. Penalties, § 11.

20. Id. at 247.

21. Id. at 250.

22. Id. at 250-251.

23. Id. at 251.

25. Id.

26. Id. at *4.

27. 656 P.2d 1238 (Ariz. 1982).

28. Id. at 1242.

29. Id. at 1241.

30. Id. at 1243.

31. See also Smart Industries Corp., 876 P.2d at 1176.

---

the practitioner’s toolbox

finding and keeping experts

National Institute for Trial Advocacy, 2001 161 pages, $16.95

Available by calling 800-225-6482 or at www.nita.org

In this diminutive 4x6-inch book, lawyers will find a quick reference to the issues governing expert witness preparation and presentation. The authors answer commonly asked questions, such as how you find experts, how you approach a problem with experts, how you can avoid mistakes when preparing experts, and how you can structure direct examination of experts. The book takes account of changes to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and Evidence that were enacted in December 2000.

Technical Advisory Service for Attorneys

www.tasanet.com or 800-523-2319

Billing itself as “the best source for experts worldwide,” TASA claims to list experts in at least 8,000 categories. Need a kayaking expert in Kuala Lumpur? Oil spill problem in Oswego? TASA says it can help you. Contacting TASA will put you in touch with a referral advisor who will ask about your needs and your timetable; they say they will be back to you within 24 hours with experts who will meet your needs.